

let it vibrate. I can't turn it off. I carry the phone as a requirement of my client / customer the US Army. The active duty Army Program Manager, for whom I work, included this requirement in my contract with my parent corporate entity, Booz-Allen & Hamilton. So, I must carry it when I am billing hours to the Army contract. I don't think mine is an extreme case. I know peers who are on-call 24 hours to their corporate entity. They are interrupted by pages and cell phone calls at dinners, church, theaters, etc.

Another issue is the laptop PC. In the last year I have stopped using my PC on airplanes and in airline terminals. I consider travel time my contemplation time. Again, I have peers who are expected to work until the PC battery dies. As mobile computing increases through the availability of high bandwidth, wireless satellite communications connections to the INTERNET these technology issues will become more complex and frustrating. I can foresee employers expecting you to retrieve your e-mail between planes, on the road in your car, at weekend outings to the beach, EVERYWHERE!

Again, thanks for an enjoyable time and a valuable handout. In fact, your handout is the only one I keep in the hangar on my runway.

ANTHONY GELISH
Program Director
Pacific Medical Network
Booz-Allen & Hamilton